A CHRISTMAS JOURNEY

BY I. RICHARDSON.

And some alteration in his tone made Blanche look up, as she replied that she had not noticed any particular oscillation.

Then she saw that his features had become as pale as his bronzed complexion would allow them to appear, and on undefinable alarm seized her suddenly.

His steadfast eyes were still seeking hers, compelling them to meet his gaze; but his lips were quivering a little now and again, and his whole countenance had altered entirely since first he entered the carriage.

Was he going to be ill, to go mad, to die? She thought of all the horrible tales she had heard or read of in connection with railway carriages, yet for her very life could not resist the fascination this man was exercising over her. Each time she met his dark, earnest, wistful gaze it increased, her very fear strengthened it. "Are you feeling ill?" she asked of him, timidly, noticing that his hands, strong, muscular, and sun-browned, were fairly trembling as they rested upon the arms of the carriage. He passed his fingers languidly over his brow.

"The shaking upsets me a little," responded he, faintly. "Have you—it is a curious request for a man—but have you a scent-bottle with you?"

She plunged into her bag to rummage for the one which ought to have been, but, alas! was not there. She scattered some of her things upon the floor as she searched about, then turned to the other passenger, who had until now sat quietly unobtrusively, to pass the request on to her, but as she did so the lady suddenly grasped her wrist, with a loud cry of alarm.

"Look!" cried she; and Blanche, starting up, saw the man falling forward from the opposite seat, his grizzled hair falling over his closed eyes. "Oh mercy!" shrieked the lady.

She was no use at all in the fearful emergency; she only grasped Blanche's arm and uttered little cries from time to time, as poor, inexperienced Blanche did her best to chafe the icy hands and force some brandy (which luckily she had found in a flask in his pocket) between the clenched teeth of the fainting man. Happily the train began again to slacken speed; they were approaching another station, and the two ladies' agitated looks and exclamations soon brought two of the carriage porters, who lifted out the heavy figure and conveyed it to the waiting-room, Blanche following in a dazed kind of way, which forbade her to remember that trains will not wait for passengers under any circumstances.

He was not dead, however, this strangely-attacked, mysterious man. A doctor came hastily to the spot, and after numerous restoratives the life which had seemed so nearly extinguished fluttered back; but its first action was a curious one. The invalid, as consciousness returned, saw Blanche bending over him, and with a wild cry and gesture he opened his arms as though to clasp her in them. She drew back dismayed, of course; she felt angry, uncomfortable, afraid; yet some subtle sympathy, some interest unaccountable, but stronger than anger or fear, made it impossible for her tear herself away from him.
